

Natixis' anti-corruption policy

Natixis has adopted a zero-tolerance policy with respect to all forms of corruption and pledges to comply with all applicable anti-corruption laws at all times.

In that respect, Natixis has made a public commitment by adhering to the 2007 UN Global Compact, whose tenth principle states:

"Businesses should work against corruption in all its forms, including extortion and bribery."

All persons working at Natixis SA must comply with internal rules and procedures aimed at preventing and detecting behaviors that could indicate acts of corruption or influence peddling.

These rules and procedures are designed to identify risky situations by relying in particular on preventing and managing conflicts of interest and performing anti-corruption due diligence when establishing new business relationships (clients, suppliers, intermediaries), prior to the establishment of partnerships or acquisition transactions, and for managing new hires.

They are also intended to assess the situation of third parties regarding corruption and influence peddling (analysis of reputation and antecedents), identify corruption risk exposure factors (such as the presence of policy-makers among the direct or indirect beneficiaries of a transaction), ensure that the various transaction participants have an economically justifiable role, verify that payments are justified, etc.

Finally, they seek to prevent the risk of incidental wrong-doing that may arise from certain practices such as the giving or receiving of gifts or invitations, the payment of funds in connection with philanthropic, sponsoring and charitable giving activities, and payments to intermediaries.

The following principles are derived from Natixis' anti-corruption policy:

a. Natixis condemns corruption in all its forms and complies with all applicable anti-corruption legislation

Natixis adheres to all applicable anti-corruption legislation and regulations.

Natixis employees are forbidden from offering, accepting, promising or paying, directly or indirectly, an undue advantage¹ intended to influence or attempt to influence a business decision and, more generally, engaging in any practices that might qualify as corruption.

They also agree not to solicit or accept an undue advantage in order to perform or intentionally not perform an act that is within the scope of their responsibilities.

This prohibition extends to cases where the person making the request or receiving the undue advantage is directly responsible for the decision as well as cases where that person has no influence over the decision.

¹ See appendix for the definition

b. Gifts and invitations may not be for the purpose of influencing a business decision

Natixis employees may not offer a gift or invitation to third parties with whom they are engaged in a business relationship if it could alter the judgment of this third party, influence his or her decision or be perceived as having influenced it.

Further, they may not solicit or accept from a third party with whom they are in a business relationship a gift or invitation that could alter their own judgment, influence their decision or be perceived as influencing their decision.

Gifts and invitations offered or received must be carried out in such a way such that they cannot be considered to create a compromising situation, influence peddling or corruption toward a Natixis employee or any other third party.

Gifts and invitations must therefore be reasonable in terms of the monetary value and frequency so as not to exceed customary practices for business relationships, and they may only be offered if they are appropriate under the circumstances.

c. Facilitation payments are prohibited

Natixis does not tolerate under any circumstance the practice of facilitation payments. These are advantages granted to a public agent for the purpose of accelerating, ensuring or facilitating the performance of a normal, non-discretionary task, such as delivering a visa or accelerating a custom clearing process.

d. Company resources may not be used to finance political organizations or activities

Natixis does not allow any type of direct or indirect subsidy/grant made in its name to political organizations or politicians.

Neither the names nor the assets of Natixis and its subsidiaries may be used to promote the interests of political parties or their candidates.

e. Sponsoring, philanthropic and charitable giving activities require special attention

Regardless whether the sponsoring, philanthropic or charitable giving activities are at the initiative of Natixis and its employees or solicited by a client, under no circumstance may the business provider or any public agent be the counterparty of a commercial advantage or the condition for the exercise of influence.

Philanthropic, sponsoring and charitable giving activities are subject to an internal verification procedure that describes the prior approval process, selection criteria for beneficiaries and grant conditions

f. Anti-corruption due diligence is performed on our third parties

Third parties (clients, intermediaries and suppliers) are subject to an assessment process that examines their situation with respect to corruption risk factors.

If Natixis uses an intermediary (business introducer, distributor, broker, sales agent, consultant, etc.) to develop its activities, reasonable ethical due diligence² is performed, mainly to ensure that the intermediary provides legitimate services and complies with the principles described in this policy.

² See appendix for the definition

No intermediary may be asked to provide services on behalf of Natixis without reasonable due diligence having first been performed and without having entered into an agreement containing the necessary guarantees against corruption.

g. Special due diligence is performed when entering into a partnership or for company acquisitions

As part of the process for entering into partnerships or acquiring controlling interests in companies, special due diligence audits are performed (e.g. in particular regarding financial, legal and ethical/integrity aspects) and their results are taken into consideration in the partnership/acquisition strategy.

h. Ledger and registry entries must be rigorously maintained

Financial flows involving Natixis and its commercial partners (clients, suppliers, intermediaries) require a contractual foundation and are duly identified and validated.

Natixis strives to ensure that its ledgers and registries reflect all transactions that it completes with its commercial partners precisely and accurately.

In any event, all employees must be vigilant and inform their line managers or Compliance department of any solicitations or pressure they may face that could represent an indicator of corruption or influence peddling. Employees who witness such actions are encouraged to report them and, if necessary, use the whistleblowing mechanism.

Appendix 1: Definitions

Undue advantage: An undue advantage may take several forms such as bribery or illegal commissions, lavish and/or repetitive gifts or invitations intended to mask the undue nature of the advantage given (charitable giving, philanthropy, sponsoring, financing of political parties, payments for a totally or partially fictitious service, job offers, etc.).

It may directly or indirectly benefit the corrupt person, his or her friends and family or entities in which he or she holds interests, in which case they appear as the beneficiaries.

It may be obscured through complex transaction structures.

Regardless of what form the advantage may take, it is “undue” any time a beneficiary accepts or solicits it in a manner that violates the beneficiary’s duties or position.

Reasonable ethical due diligence: Such due diligence may take into consideration the reputation and integrity of third parties having a working relationship with Natixis and use the scope of internal controls to prevent inappropriate behavior.